

Federal and Provincial Governments Continue to Fail Canadians on Mental Health and Substance Use Health Care

4th Annual CAMIMH Report Card Calls for Urgent Action to Improve Access, Outcomes and Accountability

(OTTAWA, ON) August 26, 2026 – A national survey of more than 4,000 Canadians, sends a clear message: mental health and substance use health care remains difficult to access, wait times are unacceptable, and governments are not delivering on the needed improvements.

In releasing its 4th Annual Report Card on Mental Health and Substance Use Health Care Services, the Canadian Alliance on Mental Illness and Mental Health (CAMIMH) found that for the fourth consecutive year, governments received a failing grade of F for mental health care services, while substance use health care fared only slightly better, receiving mostly D and F grades across the country.

The findings paint a dire picture across the country:

- 84% of all grades were Fs, while the remaining 16% were Ds.
- Canadians in 8 of 9 provinces gave the federal government an F for improving access to mental health care.
- All provinces received an F for wait times, achieving parity with physical health care, and evaluating the effectiveness of mental health services.
- Canadians who accessed mental health services in the past year rated the system no more positively than those who had not, suggesting little confidence that care is meeting people's needs.

Despite these results, Canadians believe that meaningful change is possible. Eighty-seven percent of Canadians believe timely access to mental health care is important, while 80% support hiring more mental health care providers to improve access.

"For years, Canadians have told governments that the system is not improving," said Florence Budden, CAMIMH Co-Chair. "Those who need care deserve much better. It is time for urgent action that will improve access to care leading to better health outcomes, while achieving a higher degree of system performance and public accountability."

Canadians continue to report significant barriers to substance use health services. While those who accessed services reported somewhat more positive experiences, public confidence remains low with predominantly D and F grades.

More than two-thirds of Canadians believe timely access to substance use health services is important, and nearly seven in ten believe governments should support education for the health workforce in this area.

"The data does not tell the whole story and underestimates the true need as nine in ten people who could benefit from substance use health care never seek treatment because of stigma," said Anthony Esposti, CAMIMH Co-Chair. "The voice of this majority, silenced by systemic harms, is often missed in the evaluation of care in this sector."

CAMIMH Calls for Action

To improve access, outcomes and strengthen system performance and accountability, CAMIMH is calling on:

1. The federal government to pass a Mental Health and Substance Use Health Care Parity Act as companion legislation to the Canada Health Act;
2. The federal government to establish long-term federal funding for mental health and substance use health care;
3. Provincial and territorial governments to invest a minimum of 12% of health budgets for mental health and substance use health care services; and
4. All governments to accelerate the development of pan-Canadian performance indicators and public reporting.

The evidence is clear: investing in mental health and substance use health improves health outcomes while strengthening Canada's economy. Governments have an opportunity – and a responsibility to work together to build a system that delivers timely, equitable care for everyone.

Without meaningful action, Canadians will continue to experience unacceptable wait times, unequal access to care and worsening health outcomes – leaving too many people to suffer in silence until their condition reaches a crisis point. A health system that cannot provide timely mental health and substance use health care risks turning treatable conditions into preventable tragedies – for individuals, families, communities and the entire country.

There can be no health without our mental health and substance use health.
