PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATION SUBMISSION-- AUGUST 7, 2015

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

The Canadian Alliance on Mental Illness and Mental Health (CAMIMH) is a non-profit organization comprised of 16 national health care associations that represent hundreds of thousands of citizens involved as people with lived experience, family members, academics and service providers. Established in 1998, CAMIMH is committed to evidence-based practices and provides collaborative national leadership to assure individuals living with mental illness receive the services and supports they require for recovery. CAMIMH also advocates for government policies aimed at reducing the burden of mental illness on the Canadian population and economy.

CAMIMH appreciates the opportunity to provide the following three recommendations for improving mental health services, supports and resources for Canadians; the establishment of a Mental Health Innovation Fund; the development and adoption of a common set of mental health performance indicators and; the establishment and implementation of a mental health strategy to provide better services to the populations for which the federal government has direct responsibility

ACCELERATING THE ADOPTION OF INNOVATION IN MENTAL HEALTH PROGRAMS & SERVICES

“Increase resources and capacity for a range of community mental health services that serve people of all ages”. Recommendation 3.1.1 Changing Directions, Changing Lives: The Mental Health Strategy for Canada.

Through a review of the research on services and successful outcomes we know there are a many pockets of excellence when it comes to providing Canadians with access to leading-edge, innovative mental health services and programs. The reality is that there is a lack of national coordination and resourcing to ensure that they are spread across the health system effectively.

While the term “innovation” is an often cited solution to many of the challenges facing the health system, CAMIMH understands that we need to identify and implement more cost-effective ways to provide mental health care programs, resources and services to Canadians.

We know that mental illness costs the Canadian economy more than $51 billion per year. Adopting proven innovations on a country-wide basis is crucial to alleviating some of this economic burden and will serve to improve the overall mental health of Canadians, while offering improved support and resources to all.

While the delivery of health care services is largely a provincial and territorial responsibility, CAMIMH knows there is a catalytic role the federal government can play when it comes to accelerating the adoption of proven innovations in mental health.

CAMIMH is of the view that the federal government can build on the foundation of the work of the Mental Health Commission of Canada by creating a strategically-targeted, time-limited Mental Health Innovation Fund (the Fund). This fund would support the identification of and spread of evidence-based mental health programs, resources and services that we know are effective at the community level.

CAMIMH recognizes that while there are many innovative programs and services in mental health. The Fund would provide the resources needed to advance the broader sharing and uptake of these innovations that improve patient access, quality of care, supports and health outcomes. The fund would allow the translation of these best practices into action through a collaborative, coordinated centralized knowledge-exchange approach.

The Fund would also fulfill an important component of the Mental Health Strategy of Canada including Strategic Direction 3 on access to services and Strategic Direction 6 on leadership and collaboration. “Encourage broadly based coalitions in the non-government sector to help mobilize leadership and build shared approaches to complex issues”. Recommendation 6.1.3 Changing Directions, Changing Lives: The Mental Health Strategy for Canada.

The Fund would provide the means by which the mental health community and health care providers and organizations could facilitate the coordination and sharing of best practices, moving these to availability across the country, leading to increased health care options and more cost efficient and expanded services nationally.

Recommendation #1: Establish a Five-Year $50 million Mental Health Innovation Fund with a clear mandate to encourage the dissemination and implementation of best and promising practices of services, supports and resources to improve health outcomes, and establish and report on performance indicators.

This fund will promote best practices on a pan-Canadian basis for the advancement of mental health and for the proliferation of treatments and innovative approaches that work effectively to reduce the economic, social, and human cost of mental illness. It would also work towards the establishment of pan-Canadian mental health indicators and objectives that are currently lacking.

As it stands, there are no agreed upon performance indicators that provide Canadians with a clear picture of how mental health systems are performing. Currently, when it comes to tracking publicly-funded mental health expenditures we only have data focused on acute care hospitals. While useful, this provides us with a limited picture as to how the mental health system is performing. As we know, a significant proportion of mental health programs and services are provided within communities.

CAMIMH believes the Mental Health Commission of Canada is best suited and should be the administrator of the fund, and that the MHCC would work in collaboration with CAMIMH, its national member organizations, all levels of Government, and other stakeholders as identified.

ESTABLISHING CLEAR PAN-CANADIAN MENTAL HEALTH INDICATORS

THE MEASUREMENT, PERFORMANCE & EVALUATION OF MENTAL HEALTH SYSTEMS

In the area of mental health, we need a set of system performance indicators to effectively assess the performance of Canada’s mental health services and systems.

At present there are no agreed upon mental health indicators that provide a clear picture of how Canadian mental health systems are performing. Currently, when it comes to tracking publicly-funded mental health expenditures most available data focuses on acute care hospitals and not community programs. Additionally, there is little available information in terms of the quality of services and systems. The measurement of service and system performance requires the development and reporting of performance in the quality domains of access to services, appropriateness of services received and, most importantly, the outcomes of services.

Once performance indicators are developed and reported, this evaluation capability will become the basis and driver of significant improvements in services and systems and the foundation for mental health system transformation in the territories and provinces.

While we are pleased to see that important work has been initiated in the area of mental health indicators and expenditures by the Mental Health Commission, the Public Health Agency of Canada and the Canadian Institute of Health Information, work on mental health performance indicators needs to be advanced as a national priority, CAMIMH is of the view that the federal government, working in close partnership with the provinces and territories, can play a groundbreaking role in terms of developing this national mental health performance reporting and quality improvement initiative

Recommendation #2

CAMIMH recommends that the government of Canada supports the acceleration of the development, and ultimately, the adoption of a common set of mental health performance indicators.

FEDERAL POPULATIONS

The federal government is one of the biggest direct providers of health care in the country, being directly responsible for many populations such as First Nations, Canadian Forces, RCMP, Veterans, Corrections, and others.

Building on the recent and highly positive announcement that federal employees would see psychological service coverage doubled from $1,000 to $2,000 per year, CAMIMH recommends that the federal government continues to lead by example by improving its own capacity to deliver services in areas for which it has direct responsibility.

It is CAMIMH's view that the implementation of a more robust mental health strategy for populations for which the federal government is directly responsible is equally consistent with reducing the economic and health burden which the federal government eventually bears when investment in mental health services is inadequate.

The work identified in the Mental Health Innovation Fund, would support the federal government's role in this area through making available proven services and programs.

Recommendation #3: Establish and implement a mental health strategy to provide better services to the populations for which the federal government has direct responsibility.

Recognizing that the populations for which the federal government is responsible face unique mental health challenges and that services currently provided are inadequate, the government has an opportunity to lead by example by providing a more robust set of mental health services to these groups, and can help demonstrate that in the long run enhanced investment in mental health pays fiscal and economic as well as social and human dividends.
